The Numbers

While Kentucky is not required to report on Early Medical Consideration (Early Parole) outcomes, the Parole Board responded to FAMM’s request:

2019  The Board received 37 requests, granted six, and denied 21. Three people were deemed ineligible, and seven died.

2020  The Board received 20 requests, granted seven, and denied five. Four individuals were ineligible, three died, and one was pending at the end of the year.

High and Low Marks

HIGH MARK

- Kentucky’s Early Medical Consideration eligibility criteria are clearly laid out and relatively measurable and include examples and descriptions of specific conditions. Commendably, the program does not bar anyone from consideration due to the nature of their offense, time left to serve, or for other reasons.

LOW MARKS

- It is unclear how anyone engages the process to begin assessment for Early Medical Consideration. There is no information about how corrections personnel can identify people who are potentially eligible or about how incarcerated individuals can ask for consideration, if they even can.
- Agency policy is sparse. Kentucky provides very little guidance to entities involved in the Early Medical Consideration process. FAMM could find no guidance whatsoever about the Department of Corrections’ review of an applicant by officials or any discussion of the process for gathering documents, steps to follow, or standards to apply for that review.
- The program flunked release planning support. The Parole Board must consider a parole release plan, but FAMM could find nothing about who draws up the release plan, when planning begins, or what it covers. Given that the program aims to evaluate release for incarcerated people who are dying or extremely debilitated, including those on external life support systems, the lack of provisions for supportive release planning is confounding.
- Early Medical Consideration also failed right to counsel and appeals. FAMM could find no information about whether counsel can represent people in the Parole Board proceeding or whether those denied Early Medical Consideration can appeal or reapply following the denial should their condition change.
