Understanding the Difference Between Home Confinement, Compassionate Release, and Clemency in the Federal Prison System

Home Confinement

- What it is: Home confinement is a process through which the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) selects people in prison to be sent to complete the final months of their sentence at home, rather than in a prison facility or halfway house
  - People do not need to apply to be considered for home confinement, and ultimately the selections are made entirely by the BOP
  - On April 5, the BOP clarified that anyone who believes they are eligible may request to be referred to home confinement and provide a release plan to their case manager
- How it works: The BOP is supposed to identify people with lower risk levels and lower needs and place them on home confinement
  - On March 26, Attorney General William Barr wrote a memo to the BOP asking it to do this, and describing who should be prioritized for home confinement and how placement should happen during the pandemic
  - On April 3, Attorney General Barr wrote a memo to the BOP directing it to review every prisoner with coronavirus risk factors and maximize transfers in appropriate circumstances
- What’s new during the COVID-19 outbreak?: Normally, the maximum amount of time that a prisoner may spend on home confinement is ten percent of their sentence or six months, whichever is less
  - But the CARES Act, a bill recently passed by Congress in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, allows the BOP to extend this time limitation to place people on home confinement longer
  - Attorney General Barr’s April 3 memo directs the BOP to broaden the eligible population by extending these home detention time restrictions
- Can FAMM help?: Unfortunately, FAMM cannot help people receive home confinement – the decision is entirely up to the BOP.

Compassionate Release
What it is: Compassionate release allows for your sentence to be reduced for “extraordinary and compelling reasons,” typically for terminal illness, other serious medical conditions, or very advanced age

The COVID-19 pandemic has heightened the need compassionate release

How it works: A prisoner or their loved one must send a letter to their warden asking them to bring a request for compassionate release to a federal district court judge

- If the BOP denies the request or doesn’t respond in 30 days, the prisoner or their attorney can ask the court directly for release, by filing a motion in federal district court
- Sending a letter to the warden begins this 30-day clock, so it’s important to do it as early as possible

Can FAMM help?: FAMM and other organizations run the Compassionate Release Clearinghouse, which recruits, trains, and supports attorneys who assist compassionate release applicants pro bono (for free)

- The Clearinghouse is advocating for compassionate release to the greatest extent possible during the COVID-19 pandemic, and working hard to quickly prepare new attorneys to help people with applications
- To be considered for assistance from the Clearinghouse, federal prisoners or their families should first fill out this questionnaire: http://support.famm.org/site/Survey?ACTION_REQUIRED=URI_ACTION_USER_REQUESTS&SURVEY_ID=3342

Clemency & Other Executive Action

What it is: Clemency is a process through which the president can shorten someone’s sentence (a commutation) or set aside their criminal punishment altogether and restore rights (a pardon)

- There are very few restrictions on the President’s ability to provide clemency for federal offenses

How it works: People can apply for clemency by submitting an application to the Department of Justice, Office of the Pardon Attorney. The President also sometimes selects people for clemency who have not applied, but this is very rarely done. People do not need an attorney to file a clemency request. The application forms can be found here: https://www.justice.gov/pardon/clemency-forms-instructions

What’s new during the COVID-19 outbreak?: On March 23, President Trump also mentioned the possibility of the administration using an executive order to release “nonviolent” prisoners. If the President did sign an executive order with this goal in mind, it could take the form of expanding home confinement transfers, granting broad clemency, or something else. We do not know if or when President Trump may use his clemency power during the COVID-19 crisis.
• Can FAMM help?: Unfortunately, FAMM cannot assist people with filing clemency applications or help them find lawyers to do so.
